He said, we all now know what the enterprise is, that it was the greatest opportunity ever offered Clarksville, it was the dawn of a brighter day, property would nerease ten per cent, in value the day the road was commenced, but that it was not necessary to go over as a good undertaking, and what nen, those who were active and bouyant to enter actively into the work. The enterprise would succeed, the road would be built and then every man would want to share in the glory and prosperity of Clarksville.

He then called upon Judge C. G. Smith to give an account of his recent trip through Kentucky with large audience with a graphic and detailed account of his trip with the Judges Wood along the proposed line of the road from here to Princeton. He said that at every point they stopped they found the people perfectly wild and enthusiastic in favor of the road. They were all anxious to have a railroad connection with Clarksville, and expressed a desire to send their Tobacco and other productions to this market if they had the proper transportation facilities.
